“... Human rights encompass Nature, because she is not a postcard to be looked at from the outside; even the best human laws treat it as an object of property and never as a subject of law. Reduced to a mere source of natural resources and good business, it can be legally badly wounded, and even exterminated, without hearing its complaints and without legal norms preventing impunity for its criminals. At best, and in the best of cases, only some human victims can demand compensation that is always more or less symbolic, and that is always after the damage has been done, the laws do not prevent or stop attacks on the land, the water or the air.”
